Photographers need a replacement for Photoshop Elements for manipulating images. The budget version of Photoshop, called Photoshop Express, is a great free option, but it also has a fairly steep learning curve for beginners. For those who don't want to pay for the Photoshop versions, there are a number of other software programs that you can use to manipulate and alter images. Be sure to choose a program that you are comfortable with. Figure 3-1: Here's an image from the previous two chapters, but I had to swap out the candle for a background for this chapter. Figure 3-2: After choosing a background, you can apply some additional effects with layer masks to create an interesting effect. Choosing a background You can start adding some interesting elements to the candle on a plate, but first you need to select a background. Most images have a solid color. If your image isn't solid and you're looking for a background, here are three options to choose from: Color: After you open your image in Photoshop, choose Image⇒Image Size. In the next window that appears, choose Fill Color and choose a color to use as a background. Stock: In the image to the left in Figure 3-3, I selected the Stock image in the Finder. Because I downloaded the file from Getty Images, I downloaded the TIFF file, but you can also open files in the native format of your camera. Slice: Choose this option if you are enlarging a section of an image, or if you are creating a background for a shadow or light effect. You can create a slice in the Slice tool, which will allow you to select a part of your image for cropping. Figure 3-3: Choosing a background to apply as a backdrop to the candle on the plate. You can use your background anywhere on a layer by dragging the photo or stock image. When you drag a photo, the layers come with the stock photo. It's a good idea to flatten your layers to ensure that if you drag your photo into a new file, it doesn't accidentally delete the layers on which you want to work. You can color a photo or have it printed at a color lab by adjusting the saturation in the Levels palette, which we discuss in Chapter 13. Adding additional effects After you've selected a background, you can add some interesting effects to your image. The first step to creating

Rates of basing decisions, particularly financial decisions, on stereotypes are well documented. Stereotypes are defined as set of preconceived notions which can be applied to groups of people and may characterize them. Two or more people can have the same stereotype in their minds without realizing it. Stereotypes and preconceived notions lead to beliefs about individual people or groups that are accurate or inaccurate, and they may be regarded as prejudices, or cultural bias, or as counter-stereotypical tendencies. Many studies on the subject have confirmed that some people are more likely to make certain decisions based on stereotypes than others. For example, women tend to be more generous than men towards other women, and since women are an entire stereotype, it is not surprising that more women are more generous towards other women than men. The same stereotype that teaches women to be more generous than men may also lead to women being more generous to their children than men. Also, assuming that people behave in a certain way because of the group to which they belong, is particularly commonplace for working-class people. As a result, in addition to being more generous, working-class women are also more lenient towards irresponsible behaviour, since this may be the way they are expected to behave in order to fit in with society and other people. It has also been proven that people tend to take their decisions regarding careers, financial investments, marriage, and other important life decisions based on stereotypes. However, what is not frequently considered is that stereotypes also affect people's decisions at the level of everyday purchasing habits. A recent study discovered that people with more liberal views about gender equality (more gender equality) in the economic sphere also consume products that have been introduced into the market for more liberal views (e.g. support for gender equality in the economic sphere), and that people with more conservative views about gender equality (less gender equality) in the economic sphere are more reluctant to buy such products. As a result, it is often the case that, in order for a product to be more readily bought by a group, the product needs to have a "gender-equal" character. Considerations regarding gender equality in the economic sphere are also important as more and more women enter employment (e.g. childcare) and enter the economic sphere, such as banking and finance, and industry. For example, more women are entering consulting, and more women, men and children are affected by marketing strategies in the food industry. However, generally speaking, women are still statistically less likely to

Recurrence of biliary tract cancer following pancreaticoduodenectomy. Many patients with biliary tract cancer have a poor prognosis because they are not diagnosed until the advanced stage of the disease. It is likely that the prognosis of patients who underwent pancreaticoduodenectomy (PD) for biliary tract cancer would be significantly better. We conducted a retrospective study of 20 patients with biliary tract cancer who underwent PD to assess the clinical features, surgical procedures, and prognosis. There were 16 patients with intrahepatic cholangiocarcinoma (ICC) and 4 with gallbladder cancer (GBC), including 2 adenocarcinomas and 2 adenosquamous carcinomas. The number of total nodes removed in the 20 patients ranged from 1 to 18 (median, 8); the number of positive nodes ranged from 0 to 6 (median, 2). The 19 patients with local invasive cancer underwent resection of all involved tissues in the pancreas, and 19 patients underwent biliary drainage. The operative mortality rate was 10%. The 2-year survival rate was significantly higher in the patients with complete resection than in those with incomplete resection (75% vs 25%). The median survival time was 16.5 months. Nine of the 20 patients (45%) had recurrent disease, including 7 patients with local, lymph node, or distant recurrent disease. The median interval between surgery and recurrence was 7.3 months. The sites of recurrence were peritoneum, liver, lung, lymph nodes, and distant lymph nodes. Surgical resection was performed in 14 patients. Five of the 14 patients (36%) with recurrent disease died in less than 6 months, and 9 (64%) survived more than 12 months. Our data indicate that PD can be performed in selected patients with biliary tract cancer, resulting in a relatively high rate of complete resection, a low rate of operative mortality, and a good prognosis. # -- encoding: utf-8 --
