Cindy, I think your theory about the threat to large landowners of ending their easement privileges is spot on. The Forest Service plan to move portions of the Sawtooth National Forest into the Cascades National Park and Sawtooth National Recreation Area, which would give up access to the national forest in several locations to the large landowners. The opposition, which includes the three largest pulp and paper operations in the nation is apparently drowning the Forest Service in paper. As an aside, I would not have thought that a pulp industry would find that reasonable. The Forest Service manages for multiple uses, and these big operations represent it best. I get what you're saying, and if I didn't have kids to think about right now, I would say you're definitely on the money. But I'm glad to see the situation as it is, and I'm glad to hear it's still being talked about. The only thing that would probably stop me from picking up a gun and shooting that livestock owner is if I felt like I needed a sample of the meat. But I don't need that sample, so I don't pick up a gun. Having said that, you are right about the small, the family-owned businesses, that are the backbone of our agricultural economy. The 'commodity farm' that I've helped manage for the last few years, is a classic straw bale, double-sided earth building. It is the sort of construction used by the Amish, and it involves about 50 straw bales, side-by-side, each straw bale about 20 feet long, and 8 feet high. So, each building I do is about 400 feet long, and about 50 feet wide. One side of the building has a door in it, which we make no effort to
