lets you enjoy unlimited playlists without any hidden fees. These are two examples of articles I wrote in 2011 (posted elsewhere, originally). They seem to be going completely unread. Can I keep reposting them in an attempt to reach a wider audience, without having to lie about my qualifications (not that I do either of those things)? On my first day in Paris with the Nord-Sud, I was wooed by the Museum of Continental Art. I was initially drawn to the free, outdoor exhibitions in the square. There was much to see, and I could take my time, wandering along the walls, looking for the one piece that spoke to me. I was drawn in by the crayon drawings, the rotating exhibits, the displays of books, documents, and maps. I saw the winding streets and the busy shoppers, but my gaze lingered on the flowers in the planter boxes. The city presented itself to me: the tower of Notre Dame, the general grace of the women in their suits and dresses, the washing hanging up to dry on the line. But the piece that called to me was hidden behind glass and a counter. I was drawn to the window filled with posters, coffee cups, and literature, but behind the counter stood a man, holding an e-reader on a cord, wearing a green cardigan and a blazer. He showed me the way to an unmarked door where I found a world. I don't usually talk about people in tech, but I do want to write about this fascinating guy. This guy made the tech world wonder what it was
