performance of wastewater treatment plants (WWTP) is always a difficult task, partly because it is more and more being demanded that the decision maker base his policy on data from real operating WWTPs. Since this is difficult to do, given the lack of real data, it is important to develop tools for the evaluation of water quality and the systems that, on which it is based. In this paper, we analyse the main criteria that have been used in the literature to evaluate the performance of WWTPs: total suspended solids, biodegradability, chemical oxygen demand, chemical oxygen demand removal efficiency, and ammonia-nitrogen removal. The analysis reveals that the existing criteria used are very heterogeneous, and that even though many attempts have been made to define new criteria, none has been found successful. The concepts of wastewater quality and effectiveness can be clearly separated, and the former is very different from the latter. If performance criteria are not clearly defined, they become an arbitrary value, as in the case of the "best WWTP" awards. If, however, criteria are defined using the needs of the decision maker, they will be more helpful to the
