You may have to copy one of the keys for deeper control. The tool isn't very good at working in dark areas, but I got good results with studio lighting. - - Sierra Brown is a matte girl that I am producing for new models. We have done 6 Looks. I thought I would apply two coats of tinted foundation over my brows. Then used a matte setting powder. - - I tried the blush on the lips instead of over the whole face. I like the results much better. I did one of the mattes, put the blush in place and then put on a metallic red lipstick. - - - I have used Photoshop to "sculpt" for models. That is when you use the edges of the edges of the face to lighten areas. - - I started off with golden/amber tones. You can do it in the light and in the dark and have a lot of control. - - I would suggest that people go to a hardware store where they have lighting sets and get a feel for those. - - You can get a big increase in definition with a faster camera. I did the first look on my compact canon. - - - I used the tout tool to trace the features on the face. Then I put them in as a resource. I put the layers to a solid color so that I could change them in the application. After that, I loaded the texture, put the original layer over the base and had the matte applied. I followed the same procedure for the blush and the lipstick. - - I looked at the texture, then graded each feature. I kept the details as solid. Then I put an outer glow. - - If the shadow and the highlight are in the same file, I would try it twice. - - For the skin, I made the best choice for the light source. It was a 3da54e8ca3
