Q: Setting up a stateful WCF Web Service I'm learning WCF Web Services and I've got a test app up and running. It has a simple service contract which is stateless in nature, and I've confirmed that the webservice is running with WCF Test Client. My question is about best practices for WCF Service? Should I implement my Service contract as stateful (contracts.cs file) or as stateless (service.cs file)? In either case I'd be accessing the state of my service in the callbacks of various WCF Operations. A: WCF services should be stateless. You're better off implementing a service contract as stateless. This is primarily to ensure that the state of your service does not change during service lifetime. If you're worried about issues with stateful service, try having a look at this question: ShareState in WCF - valid for .NET 3.5 and 4.0? RBS report finds savings for council and ratepayers The report by the Royal Borough of Windsor and Maidenhead (RBWM) and its Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) Partner said that the partnership has been very successful in local authority partnership, with the RBWM receiving £27.4 million of savings for the period of the agreement in January 2015. The report said that in the first full financial year of the partnership the partnership demonstrated significant savings for the Council, making up to £6.5 million. Commenting on the report, David Blayney, chief constable of the RBWM, said: "Our partnership with the ACPO Partnership has been very successful, with some fantastic examples of local crime reduction through cooperation between police and local authorities. "This report clearly shows that we have saved £27.4 million for the Royal Borough of Windsor and Maidenhead (RBWM) for the period of January 2015 to January 2016. "Some of these savings have come from cutting the number of local crime officers in certain police areas, but a large
