Please donate, when you can, and. Having one of the best faculty members in the country may seem like a big deal. But that's no small feat in a military education environment like the one at West Point. For one thing, the Army public affairs office has been under fire from the Pentagon's chief spokesman for using in-house media to send out glowing e-mails to West Point faculty, alumni and parents. That prompted an internal West Point investigation into the e-mails, which yielded an inspector general report condemning the media campaign and recommending the public affairs office's director not be rehired. The problem is President Barack Obama wants Obama's Army to be an information-sharing operation that delivers positive news about all the services and the U.S. military. And the president wants the Army to be an academy that's considered among the best in the world, with its graduates competing well in every combat field. It's not just about delivering positive messages. After all, if the Army loses a war, it would be a huge embarrassment for both the Army and the Obama administration. "I would have a real problem with anyone who wants to tarnish the image of the Army," Lt. Gen. Michael Barbero, the Army's public affairs chief, told the Army Times. In other words, Barbero is trying to protect the brand. Like any brand, it has a positive and a negative image. The Army is now working
