This invention relates to composite tubing products and more particularly to a composite polyurethane/thermoplastic resin impregnated tube made from a plurality of impregnated strips. Industry uses large quantities of composite tubing in the manufacture of various products. Examples of these tubes include oil pipes, automobile hoses, hose segments, and the like. Composite tubes are generally of two types, seamless and welded seam. Seamless composite tubes are formed by a tubing fabrication operation where a tubular mandrel impregnated with a thermosetting resin is placed within a mold and cured. Welded seam tubes are made by extruding thermoplastic resin, either in molten state or as pellets, into a mold where it hardens to produce the base tube. A flexible hose is then helically wound on the base tube to form a tube having a welded seam. The composite tubing products of the prior art have several disadvantages. Tubing formed by a mandrel impregnation process is normally limited to small section tubes with relatively large diameters. Tubing made from pellets is limited by the need for an extrusion step, as described, where the pellets are usually limited to thermoplastic resins such as polyethylene, polypropylene and various copolymers thereof. Seamless tubing is generally used for larger diameter tubing. The flexible tubing applied to the base tube of the welded seam tube is usually made from high modulus flexible thermoplastics such as thermoplastic polyesters, thermoplastic polyimides, or thermoplastic polysulfones. Tubing made from these high modulus thermoplastic materials is typically limited to small diameter tubes with limited wall thicknesses. Composite tubing products having the general characteristics described above are described in U.S. Pat. No. 4,385,619 which issued to Mattler on May 31, 1983. In the reference the tubing is impregnated with a blend of a reactive thermosetting resin, such as polyisocyanate, and a thermoplastic resin. Mattler teaches that a high modulus thermoplastic resin is used to enhance the flexibility of the tubing product and that a thermoplastic resin that is compatible with the thermosetting resin, such as polyethylene or polypropylene, is used to improve the adhesion between the resin and the body of the tubing. These designs are limited in the types of thermosetting resins that can be used and in the types
