Q: How to set mouse cursor to protected area of a java graphics environment? I know this sounds like a very basic question, but for some reason I can't find anything about how to do it. Given a Java Graphics environment, how to I make it so that when I move the mouse over the screen the cursor is on the certain part of the screen instead of its default position (closest to the screen)? I know about the Graphics.setCursor() method, but for some reason it seems to be pointing to the "closest" point of the window. Is there a property of the Graphics environment that I'm missing? A: The Graphics.getPointerInfo() gets a PointerInfo object (i.e. holds information about the cursor). The setPointerInfo() method sets this info. Then the getPointerLocation() returns where the cursor is relative to the graphics. The setPointerLocation() puts the cursor at that location. More particularly, the present invention relates to a machine which lowers and raises a meat carrier which includes a plurality of spaced plate-like projections which are arranged to define a plurality of support bands for receiving the meat product. In the meat packing industry it is common to transfer a cut section of meat from a first processing line to a second processing line. The first processing line customarily utilizes a continuous band of plastic or steel material which is adapted to receive the meat section on the band. The band is formed of overlapping sheet material which is manually placed about a meat section and welded together. The band continuously conveys the meat product to a standard belt driven meat product transfer machine. The machine transfers the meat product, in cross section, from the band to a second meat product transfer machine which packages the cut section into product boxes. The primary purpose of the meat transfer machine is to properly and accurately transfer the meat product onto the band so that the meat product may be accurately packaged in a box for distribution. In order to make the machine more accurate and rapid, it has been common practice in the industry to raise and lower the meat package for transfer between the processing lines. In other words, the meat carrier is raised to receive a meat product and then lowered to a desired location for the desired packaging operation. In the prior art it
