Higher-order DNA and RNA patterns in a rhinovirus. Biopolymers were prepared on a semi-regular, partially oriented DNA support. For the polymerization of DNA, the template was a partially denatured oligomer. For RNA polymerization, an intercalating compound was used. Both RNA and DNA polymerized onto the template during incubation at 25 degrees C, creating a higher-order structure. This structure was persistent at low temperatures as shown by sedimentation of the substrate. The size of the formed structures ranged from 67 to 134 nm. The size of the ribonucleotide layer could be controlled with the intercalating compound. RNA polymerization was found to be more efficient than DNA polymerization.
