PC Game Review In the The Tale of an Elden Lord In the mid-2nd century, the land was ruled by the Great Black King, the most powerful sorcerer in all the lands. The king prospered with his peace and a prosperity brought to the entire world by the magic of his people. Laid to waste at the hands of his great rival, the Elder King, the Great Black King committed suicide, leaving behind a young child, Linzi. Raised in the service of the royal court, Linzi's destiny was to become the crown princess. The Elder King, however, had other plans. Instantly taking the title of the Great King and the position as a general, the Elder King took over the kingdom, setting his sights on the young Linzi. The Great King, convinced that Linzi could be his nemesis, felt only contempt for her but his control over his kingdom's military was nowhere near what it was before, and Linzi's presence began to weigh heavily upon his military in ways he had never experienced before. Little by little, the people began to fear the Elder King. The soldiers serving under his command did his bidding and continued to suppress and oppress. They began to report at least one or two of them to the King, and yet their reports still failed to bring him down. So, in a burst of rage, the Elder King decided to seize the throne for himself. Moving quickly, he imprisoned the Great King and usurped the Royal Army, using them to seize the country. After his father's death, Linzi led a group of citizens that was secretly fighting against the Elder King's rule. One day, the Elder King heard a rumor that Linzi had managed to assassinate his father. Incensed, the Elder King, along with the soldiers he had taken over, moved to capture Linzi. After a long and bitter battle that ultimately ended in the death of many of Linzi's followers, she and her supporters managed to escape. The Elder King led his army to chase them down, but Linzi was mortally wounded. Rather than surrender, she sacrificed herself to turn the power of the magic of the lands against him. After the Elder King's defeat, the lands suffered in a time of war that lasted a decade. After peace was restored in the land, the Elder King was forced into a trial for his crimes. And on the next day a court in the city of Lyon had the two Serpentins hung, for stating that "he who inflicted death may not be called bad or good." The leaders of the Palais-Royal used to have a collection of little sculptures similar to those at Fontainebleau. Several of the subjects were very amusing. One of them represented a handsome old gentleman asking an ugly little man, "What am I to do?" "I don't know," said the obese one, taking out a large pair of spectacles, "but I'll find out for you." "You'll be right," said the old gentleman, relieved; "I'll sell something." The other was full of figures, an old man embracing a middle-aged one, both of them weeping. "Monsieur le moisin," said a sardonic rhyming Parisian, "il peut boire, il peut manger; il peut donner des baisers, il peut tout." The title of the most noble of all the Palais-Royal statues was "King Pelade." He was an ordinary-looking man, with a cow's head, and a crown of brass. He was standing on a pedestal, his hands stretched out. There was a little inscription: "They are false who live on the faults of others." In connection with the Palace-Royal, and other things which we have narrated, there are a number of anecdotes to be told; for instance, the device of the Elector's garter. The Elector was at that time much attached to the French, and the Elector of Saxony, who was called the Elector of the Palais-Royal, was charged with the duty of giving his friend some mark of distinction. The Elector of Saxony thought that his garter would be the right thing, and so it happened. The Elector cavorted with all the young women who passed
