What's new in Graffiti Cozy:

(1975) In Black Mountain Park in Georgia there was a wing of the government department. The area was known for its scenery, and for its attempt to capture the spirit of the Wild West. It was a period during which this was attempted to make a new beginning in the history of the world's races. The government department was in charge of the keeping an eye on the Native Americans, who now have to be careful not to spread all across the territory. Its men also provide infrastructure for the city. Formerly the area was nobody's business - uncharted lands. But here a government department has its own work. The government department's wing had a long fence protecting it from the male Mesteneszo. The area was pointed out to the best natural places to hunt, and shooting rights were freely issued on this basis. The hunters did not have much time to prepare, so the game animals moved away to the forest. There they roamed unconcerned, not knowing what awaited them. They did not know that the man-eating Mesteneszo was after them. He came that night, because he knew that the hunters had gathered in the area of the government department and would stay there till morning. He had been lying in wait for the hunters, just like Coyote, who waited for the rabbit when it set out for a wander. As soon as the hunters had assembled, a few that had been chosen by the higher level, the Mesteneszo attacked them. They were not lucky. One had been killed at the first blow, and there were no witnesses in the area. After the Mesteneszo had taken their weapons, they ran away back to the forest. Up to now it had all gone well, the hunters were safe. And then the Mesteneszo came to the homestead of Borego, who lived nearby. He didn't like people who were armed. Waldemar is open-minded, he doesn't believe in the Mesteneszo, and neither do I. But Borego felt better when the Mesteneszo came to him. The Mesteneszo knew him, and he liked them. People, who are curious, go to talk to Mesteneszo in their homes. They asked him about their past history. Borego was the storyteller. He told them great stories, and they were interested.
