Ask HN: As a one-person software development team, where is the bottleneck? - strukturfekt I am a developer and I've got an idea for a webapp, which I'm developing myself. I managed to bootstrap the first prototype, which is working now, but I'm really not happy with the UI of the app at this point. I also think that the idea is lacking and I'm not sure whether I should just let it go and only finish the app for a (for me) completely irrelevant reason. I can't accept the idea that this app will not turn out well because of me. It's something that would make us all a bit richer and I want to push it to the next level and I believe that I'm the guy who can do it. Of course I can find some developers to help me and I know it can work, but I'm also interested in understanding what I can work better on my own. Does the problem lie somewhere else in the project? What would you do if it were you? ===== nb What do you think is important about this app? A lot of software development is a question of not waiting for the perfect first iteration and iterating as soon as the features are mostly finished (from a business perspective). For example, it doesn't make sense to wait until your average revenue is perfect to build it--you need something to be built for now--and if it's actually very hard to monetize it (i.e. get enough traction), then it's probably going to be a distraction 1cdb36666d

A: You have two options. You could leave the code as is, and take advantage of the fact that you're in the middle of something that needs to run before the page can load (e.g., the tag to download a file). Another option is to wrap the PDF in ``, and add the `src` attribute to the tag with your download URL. This should work regardless of where you put it. The reason I recommended the first option is because it's much faster to update than anything else. As for the second option, it works because the `` element allows you to wrap up content, and since the URL you have in there is simple, you can download files without waiting for the page to fully load. The invasion and expansion of cancer metastasize cells from the initial tumor. During this process tumor cells likely move through multiple body fluids before becoming "sessile" in a second, secondary tumor or forming "clumps" of cells in a tertiary tumor (i.e. resulting in the "tree growing up" characteristic of the metastatic cascade). By analyzing the behavior of tumor cells that have been taken up into the circulation of mice the proposed experiments will examine whether tumor cells have an enhanced survival and transmissibility during their transit through the body and thereby facilitate the invasion and colonization of metastases. The proposed experiments will test whether the survival and transmissibility of tumor cells is affected by the route of passage through the body, i.e. whether the cells survive longer and/or have a higher transmissibility in lymphatic than in capillary-blood-derived lymph. Tumor cells from B16 melanoma and Friend leukemia viruses are injected intravenously (i.v.) into C57BL/6 mice. A "positive" tumor (i.e. one which grows by intravascular invasion) is inoculated at the site of the injection. This study will examine whether the cells present in lymphatic and/or cap
