1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to a radio-frequency (RF) duplex communications unit which includes a first and a second antenna for wireless communications and a radio-frequency (RF) duplex communications radio unit which includes a first and a second receiver. The first and the second receiver both receive RF input signals transmitted from the first and the second antenna, respectively, to provide a mixed RF signal. The mixed RF signal is filtered and converted to a receive signal. The first and second receiver both process the receive signal to provide a first and a second receiver output signal, respectively. The first and second receiver output signals are each coupled to a respective output port of the duplex radio unit for transmission to a respective destination. 2. Description of the Prior Art Many radio-frequency (RF) and other wireless communications systems, including the frequency modulated (FM) radio broadcast system use two separate antennas to communicate simultaneously over a single RF radio frequency channel, thus avoiding the need for the frequency bands for two-way communications. Typically, one antenna serves as a receive antenna and the other serves as a transmit antenna. The one antenna that serves as a receive antenna is usually referred to as the "in-phase" (I) antenna, while the other antenna that serves as a transmit antenna is usually referred to as the "quadrature" (Q) antenna. In an automatic frequency control (AFC) loop, the phase of the RF carrier signal of the I and Q signals is continuously compared. The RF carrier signal of the I and Q signals is usually obtained by mixing the RF signal with a frequency-division-multiplexed (FDM) oscillator to form an IF (intermediate-frequency) signal, followed by filtering of the IF signal to obtain the RF carrier signal of the I and Q signals. The predetermined location of the mixing occurs in phase quadrature fixed phase in the I and Q signals. The AFC loop is arranged to continuously switch between the I and Q signals and phase quadrature fixed phase, in accordance with the difference between the detected I and Q signal phases of the RF signal, which is indicative of the RF amplitude of the RF signal. Several RF radio-frequency (RF) duplex communications units are known in the prior art for simultaneous transmission and reception of a single RF radio-frequency channel over a single RF radio frequency channel. However, such duplex communications units have the disadvantage of limited bandwidth as a result of harmonic filtering techniques that have

Can private sponsorship of third world medical projects ever work? A review of the evidence. This paper takes a critical look at the myriad of international medical projects which are currently funded through corporate sponsorship. Despite the demise of such schemes over the past two decades, some recent initiatives have been made in the former Soviet Union. Proponents of such schemes have shown that sponsors are indeed willing to contribute. However, there are few hard data that demonstrate sponsorship by corporations actually improves the quality of care in the sponsor's own community, leading to the conclusion that such schemes are unlikely to succeed.
