Thomas This is a very interesting look at how people adjust to developing a critical, objective, scientific mind as adults. The author writes "The best scientific evidence is obtained only after many years of hard work, courage and patience". The fact is that she, and many scientists and others, including her husband, think "objectivity" can mean "ignoring evidence" or "looking the other way on injustices". She writes that her own development of critical thinking was serendipitous. While her mother was into intuition and her grandmother was emotional, her father was well-read, analytical and critical. This is a nice book because there is a great deal of attention to her personal development, starting as a child and moving into parenthood. The book also gives a very thorough explanation of the development of a critical, scientific mind. Her interest, or passion, for science started in childhood and her father. She studied Biology as an undergraduate, started a long-term project in Macrobiology as a graduate student, and started working on her doctorate in small cells. With the help of several mentors and a powerful intellect, she developed a critical view of science and rejected conventional science. She describes how her work was often at odds with what she perceived as the accepted way of doing things and how that developed her personal philosophy. As we mature, we develop a very personal view and background in which we must judge new information. For example, she
