A: You can use query caching with the MappedCache interface as documented here. Another option is to use the OpenSession in the service and configure caching that way. See here for information on OpenSession as well as transaction and entity management. A third option, if it is okay to change your queries to filter and present relevant data, is to use EntityManager#refreshCache. Q: How can I break my MPW build into smaller targets? I'd like to build a specific implementation of some C++ data structures in MPW. While you can instantiate an object and pass it to a function, how can I instantiate an object at runtime and then send its instance to the function? A: You can do that by compiling your module as an external library. You do that in the MPW source command: mpw source --module

'libname.module' The --module switch tells MPW to create a library module file (the *.module extension is not mandatory). The object you want to pass around is simply defined as an external variable. See the following example: # include typedef char name_t[10]; void f_test() { int i; name_t my_name; for (i=0; i
