"We could have done so much better. I do regret that, to be honest," he added. The British newspaper suggests that the Kremlin's victory will be a "humiliating" setback for the US administration. However, former Kremlin adviser Aleksander Dugin, who like Muratov also worked under Putin and was himself sacked by the Kremlin in 2009, told the BBC: "The whole story is fake. "It's not news that the media in the US is desperate and looking to discredit the president of Russia. "The Brits are not the only ones who cover it up. There are so many scandals, corruption and so many stories coming out against the president." 'False narrative' Mr Dugin added: "It's a complete lie that there is some kind of witch-hunt against gays. It's part of a false narrative that they have built up. They talk a lot about the persecution of gays and minorities. "The United Kingdom is so devoted to the narrative that has been created that they cannot see beyond that." One Kremlin critic, who asked not to be named, told the Independent that the high-level snub was a sign of how relations were rapidly improving with the Trump administration. He said: "I think it is indicative of a deepening of the relationship between London and Moscow. "The embassy have stopped referring to the 'Kremlin' and are now calling it the 'the
