Computer vision: A digital camera is not magic. The larger-capacity storage and MP (mega-pixel) camera sensors are not better than the older one-megapixel chip and smaller. But they do have much more memory that can store greater amounts of image information. Newer camera systems are also capable of capturing more than the standard 16 or 24 frames per second and can capture video of 30, 60, 120, and 240 frames per second. There are many other computer-vision capabilities for digital image capturing and processing, such as face detection, perspective adjustment, facial re-sizing, zooming, color correction, and contrast, that have become industry standards. Focusing: The autofocus capability in newer cameras is pretty good, so you should be able to get a sufficient shot, even with an old, small camera. But the idea of "snap to focus" — which I love — doesn't work with all autofocusing systems. In most cases, you have to manually focus the camera. However, you can get autofocusing in a pinch by using autofocus with a "lock on focus" tool. I discuss autofocus in depth in Chapter 9, but if you're working with a new camera system, you want to read Chapter 16 to determine how the autofocusing capabilities work. In the old days, when film was in common use, I would shoot only in manual mode. I hated autofocusing, because it allowed me only one chance to focus on the subject. to finalize their elections. The role of the European Union The eurozone crisis has prompted calls for the creation of a European Stability Mechanism (ESM) that would allow the funds of the ECB to be used directly to lend to countries who request them. This crisis could also become a catalyst to deepen the single currency area, as the idea of a common currency was one of the main objectives of the monetary union, created in 1999. In fact, this idea of a single currency has been declining, due to the lack of compliance with its goals. According to a Eurobarometer survey conducted in June 2013, only 61% of respondents believed that the euro is a good thing for the continent, only 38% think that it has a common destiny, with only 33% believing that it is a common good. But now the time has come to start talking again about the creation of this single currency. In this sense, in 2013 the president of the European Central Bank (ECB), Mario Draghi, said that it is possible for a single currency to be created in the coming decades, but without complicating the economic and political situation of the countries who want to join. More recently, in October 2013, Draghi said that the ECB has done its job, and it is now time to go forward. It was in this context that he announced that the ECB would buy €20 bn of bond issued by the joint forces of southern European countries, which decided to stop the bailouts of Greece and Cyprus. This decision was a policy of economic diplomacy on the part of the ECB, which seeks to apply the necessary pressure to governments to achieve the economic reform that is needed for the stability of the eurozone. The same month, Mario Draghi also signed a deal with the president of the European Commission, Jean-Claude Juncker, for the European semester. He offered to begin a €500 bn program of loans to countries who have had a severe fiscal crisis, provided that they meet several conditions. The future of Europe In politics, if there is no change, there is no progress. And, we should not forget, the European elections will take place in May 2014. Will there be a change? I think that it is too early to say, but it seems to me that if there are no changes, the chances of a European government and a very powerful European Parliament are higher. Now, what I want to believe is that there is a willingness
