Watson Island Watson Island is a rocky islet, approximately from the south-east tip of South Georgia. The name was discovered by the Russian Antarctic Expedition of 1819-22 under Fabian Gottlieb von Bellingshausen. It was named for John and Georgina Watson (1786-1859), who through a series of explorations to South Georgia made important geographical discoveries. The island measures in size, with an area of about, rising to, including seven minor rocky hummocks, all that remained of an east-west ridge that once reached to about before decollating as an island; this ridge is most prominent to the west. The island is of the type often described as a circular reef with an oval hole in the middle. The submerged reef forms the shallower of the two deep water passages, one on each side of the island. The harbour discovered by John and Georgina Watson was charted as such by the British expedition led by James Weddell, which took up winter quarters in South Georgia in 1821-22. A later expedition led by Thomas Rebeor, when accompanying Antarctic whalers, discovered a second harbour, which he named after himself. The island was named by Franz Brentano for the astronomical authority, Johannes Hevelius (Hevelius Island), whose 31st observation of "The Crab" (a bright object in the constellation Scorpius) fixes the movement of the Sun to within 0.2 seconds of the "observed" time. It is north-northeast of Cape Anne and north-northwest of Lion Bay, South Georgia. See also List of Antarctic and sub-Antarctic islands
