1. Field of the Invention This invention pertains to the field of cryogenic dispensers for the delivery of liquids. More specifically, this invention pertains to a gas manifold and nozzle for the delivery of liquid air to a heated manifold for subsequent dispensing of liquid air, the gas manifold and nozzle being insulated to prevent conductive heat transfer from one part of the system to another. 2. Description of the Prior Art The cryogenic dispensing of liquids in the medical field includes the delivery of oxygen to a patient to treat respiratory ailments, and the delivery of liquid nitrogen to a patient to treat cataracts. In the past, these dispensing systems were generally of two basic configurations. A first basic configuration utilizes a "snow gun" or "snow gun" type cryogenic system, as shown, for example, in U.S. Pat. No. 4,640,421 to Saul et al. This basic configuration includes a liquid container or reservoir, a tank for storing the liquid air, a pump to pressurize the liquid air, a heater, a regulator, and a hose for dispensing the pressurized liquid air. The tank and reservoir are mounted on a cart and typically are brought to the patient. This first basic configuration provides the high pressure required for the delivery of liquid air, but has several disadvantages. The initial components that are used include a tank for storing the liquid air, a tank for storing the gas air, a pump for pressurizing the liquid air, a heater for vaporizing liquid air, a regulator for regulating the pressure of the pressurized gas air, and a hose or pipe for delivering the pressurized gas air. The tank for storing the liquid air typically is insulated, because the liquid air can freeze in the tank. The heater is typically electrically heated, and the regulator is typically electric. All of the components are mounted on a cart, which is carried by the medical professional. The initial cost of the first basic configuration is significant. Also, the first basic configuration occupies a fair amount of space, which often interferes with medical procedures such as procedures on the side of the patient, or procedures which require other equipment to occupy the space. Also, this first basic configuration has a relatively high weight which makes the cart difficult to maneuver, particularly if a patient is treated in an emergency situation. The first basic configuration must be positioned on a floor, and if one component of the first basic configuration is lost, there is a risk that the entire first basic

Q: Is it necessary to set lock mode=exclusive to allow multiple writers? I am looking at the following implementation of a pessimistic lock: class ThreadSafe: MAX_ATTEMPTS = 5 def acquire(self, lock=True, timeout=None): """Acquire the lock, raising a LockTimeoutError if acquire() is not able to acquire the lock within a second. If timeout is not None, there is also a non-blocking variant of this method, which can wait up to timeout seconds for the lock to become available. If the lock is available within the time specified by timeout, return immediately. Otherwise, raise a LockTimeout exception, after sleeping for at most one second. If the lock argument is true, the function will block the calling thread until it can acquire the lock. """ if not lock and timeout is not None: # If a timeout is specified, we must lock lock = True try: self._lock.acquire(False, timeout) except (IOError, OSError): # If we are unable to lock, we can only retry up to MAX_ATTEMPTS times if not lock: # We're not going to actually wait, so we have to fail now raise if self.MAX_ATTEMPTS
