Instead of paying a monthly service fee, I decided to get my internet connection from the nation's longest power line. The New Jersey-New York overhead power grid, spanning more than 1,100 miles of overhead electrical wire, connects New York and New Jersey. The New Jersey side of the power line is by way of the long-haul network of a major telecommunications provider called SONCAT, an acronym for "SONic CARrier Overhead High-voltage Cables." SONCAT currently provides broadband access over the power line to homes in three states in the Northeast — Connecticut, New Jersey, and New York — and is continuing to roll out service to some parts of Pennsylvania. When the service was first launched in Connecticut in 2010, SONCAT set prices far below those of cable companies and even rival over-the-air companies. For instance, the company's proprietary service, known as SONIC, starts as low as $39 per month. According to a report on SONCAT published by Inside Network Carrier Networks, SONCAT is the lowest priced broadband service available — rivaling cable providers and virtual private networks. Under the guidelines of the Universal Service Commitment, mandated by the 1996 Telecommunications Act, the federal government must ensure that every household in the United States has access to telecommunications service at an affordable cost. When we posted an article last night about the rumored return of Roger Miller to television, people understandably lost their minds. And they're not wrong. The 'Ozzie's Angels' star's TV comeback could almost be considered inevitable, given that Miller's current sitcom, Fox's 'The Millers,' has been a financial and critical disappointment. If it weren't for his reportedly Emmy-winning role in HBO's 'Curb' — which apparently didn't do much business on TV — Miller's popularity would be soaring. That said, a comeback show for Miller is mostly hypothetical. One big reason for that is that Miller and his old writers' room are locked out of the half-hour sitcom he created with Jackie Kennedy and George Lindsey, which goes on the air on Friday. Miller has reportedly tried to buy the show back from him, but nobody's budged. Miller could always write and produce a new episode and sell the rights. And there's one show he would probably be making money off of: 'Curb.' If Fox was going to attempt to sneak him back into primetime with the assistance of 'The Millers,' they could put together a pretty sweet double-bill of 'The Ballad of Davy Crockett' and 'Ozzie's Angels.' Maybe the network could do Miller's new show on Friday night and 'Curb' on Sunday night, which would give them some much needed fresher primetime competition. Then again, 'The Ballad of Davy Crockett' wouldn't seem like a good fit for a guy whose job was to subvert TV stereotypes. In any case, it is only a rumor, and it is one that could never be confirmed.Q: Is there a way to customize the "return" action in a form? I'd like to put a hidden image near the "return" button.
